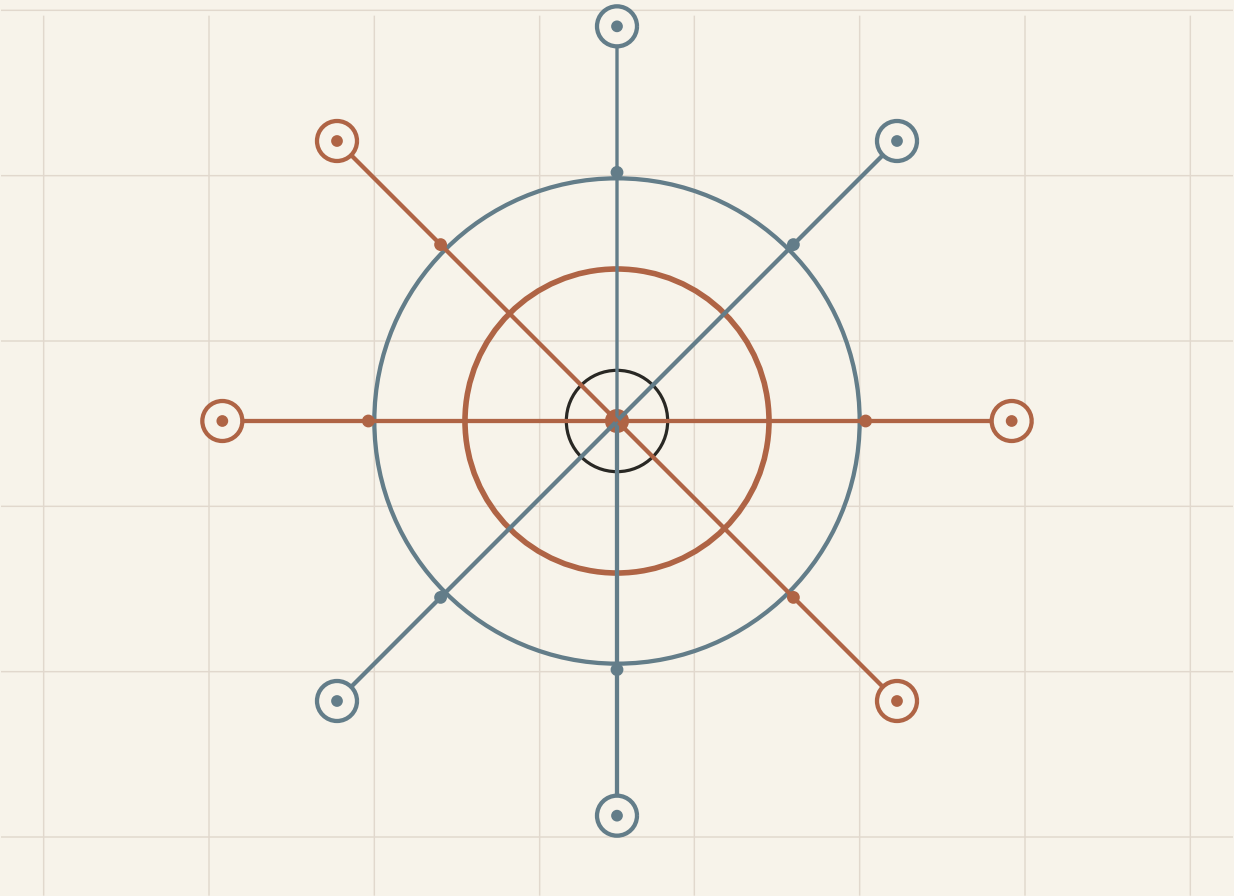
Relationships are the strategy. Everything else is the expression.

The Signal You Send

Brand Clarity, Human Connection, and the Choices That Shape Your Business

Ali Craig



NEUROIETY®

The Signal You Send

Brand Clarity, Human Connection, and the Choices That Shape Your Business

Ali Craig

NEUROIETY®

Copyright © 2027 by Ali Craig

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed, or transmitted in any form or by any means, including photocopying, recording, or other electronic or mechanical methods, without the prior written permission of the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical reviews and certain other noncommercial uses permitted by copyright law. For permission requests, write to the publisher, addressed “Attention: Permissions Coordinator,” at the address below.

Notoriety®
4500 Williams Dr Ste 212-421
Georgetown, TX 78628
(512) 213-9758

First edition, 2027
Printed in the United States of America
Subject: Business, branding, and marketing

Contents

Introduction 1

The Person Behind the Purchase 5

The Founder and the Audience Both Belong 9

What They Mean Before They Say It 15

Know Yourself and the People You Serve 20

Build a Brand People Can Feel 25

The Website Is the Relationship in Action 29

When the Brand No Longer Fits 33

Practice Pages 36

Your Next Decision 42

The Signal at a Glance 44

How to Use This Guide

Read for the relationship
The chapters move from how people experience a brand to the choices a founder can make. Read them in order if you want the full picture. If you have a specific question, use the contents to begin with the chapter closest to it.

Pause where a decision is yours
The practice pages help you connect the ideas to real conversations, customer behavior, and your own experience. Write down what you know, what you are interpreting, and what you still need to learn.

Use the short review at the end
Chapter 9 gathers the central argument and the contribution of each chapter in one place. Use it to revisit the ideas, then return to the fuller discussion when you need more context.

Choose one next step
You do not need to change every part of your brand at once. Let what you notice guide one decision you can make, test, or discuss next.

Introduction

The Signal Is Already Being Sent

Here is the part of brand work that can make a room go quiet: we can all put on our “smart business” hats and start talking in tidy lists. Audience. Revenue. Event. Brand. Those things matter, but they are not the whole reason anyone started. The founder was not building a logo for sport. She wanted the organization to do meaningful work, grow enough to support its leader, and reach people who needed it. That human reason belongs in the room with the numbers.

A Founder, a Brand, and a High Stakes Event

A military-connected nonprofit came to Victor + Valor through a personal introduction from another nonprofit we knew. The organization was doing meaningful work in a space where I had rarely seen anyone meet the need. I saw its potential right away.

Victor + Valor® is a nonprofit that works with military-connected entrepreneurs. It uses Neuroiety® methodologies, including Neuro Human Branding® and the broader Neuroiety® frameworks, directly with those founders to help them build brands and businesses that can connect with the people they serve.

The nonprofit was young, perhaps a year or a year and a half into its work. It was bringing in less than $50,000 a year, while its executive director was carrying a full-time responsibility without a full-time income. The organization wanted to grow toward $250,000 in annual revenue, build a fundraiser, and create an event that could help move it toward that goal.

The founder had made the logo and chosen the colors. She liked them. That mattered. A brand is not a detachable decoration. It carries memory, effort, intention, and the feeling of having made something from nothing. I did not want to strip that away for the sake of a cleaner design.

But the audience was much broader than the founder. The people the nonprofit needed to reach included men and women, people from different military branches, people of different ages, and people with different backgrounds. The visual identity and website needed to speak to that full community, as well as to donors who needed to understand the mission and trust the organization with their support.

I told the founder that we would need to change a lot. I asked whether she could separate herself from parts of the work she had already created. She said yes. We kept elements that held emotional meaning for her, and we reworked the logo, the website, and the rest of the identity around the people the nonprofit needed to reach. When she saw the new direction, she loved it.

Then, a few days later, she changed her mind. She said she hated the work and wanted help with the event instead. She wanted a six-figure event, but wanted to keep the existing brand and website.

I had to be direct. An event does not live apart from the organization hosting it. The invitations, registration page, donation path, social posts, sponsor materials, event experience, and follow-up all point back to the organization. I could help create a beautiful event. I could not responsibly tell her that the event had a credible path to a six-figure result while the brand and website were failing to speak clearly to the people she needed to reach.

The founder had poured herself into the organization. She was not wrong to feel attached to what she had made. The problem was that the attachment had begun to protect the existing brand from the very audience the organization needed to serve. I told her, lovingly, that she was holding the baby so tightly she was suffocating it.

I knew the line was blunt. I also knew a softer sentence would have made the moment more comfortable for me, not more useful for her.

That is a hard thing to hear. It is also a hard thing to say when you care about the person and the mission. I told her she was welcome to return when she was ready to revisit the brand. We could not do our best work while pretending that the event and the brand were separate problems.

This is not a story about a bad founder, a bad client, or a designer who knows best. It is a story about a real tension. The founder needed to recognize herself in the organization she was building. The audience needed to recognize that the organization understood them. Donors needed to understand what their support would make possible. The brand had to make room for all of those people.

What Neuro Human Branding® Brings Together

A brand sends a signal whether its owner intends to send one or not. The signal comes through its name, its visuals, its words, its choices, its website, its service, and its behavior. A founder may intend to communicate care and urgency. A donor may see an unclear website and wonder whether the organization is ready to manage the gift. A client may hear “personal service” and then encounter an automated process with no human contact. People respond to what they experience, not only to what we meant.

This is the work of Neuro Human Branding®: bringing together the human biology beneath our responses, the psychology and social story through which we interpret ourselves and one another, and the brand we build to create a relationship. The brand lives in how that relationship feels when someone meets the real business. The mood board, the home page, and the service process are all part of that experience.

The founder belongs in that equation. So does the audience. If a brand is built only around the audience, the founder may not feel connected enough to represent it with conviction. If it is built only around the founder, the people it is meant to serve may not recognize themselves in it. The work is to find the point where the founder can stand behind the brand and the audience can see that the brand understands what matters to them.

That balance is more than a design problem. It begins with people: what they notice, what they have learned to expect, how they understand themselves, what they need from a relationship, and what makes a particular offer matter. Then it becomes visible in the organization's choices.

Who This Guide Is For

This guide may be especially useful to women founders leading businesses in the $250,000 to $500,000 annual revenue range, where the brand may have grown more complicated than the work they began with. The ideas can also help other founders and leaders who want a more honest relationship between their business, their audience, and the experience they create.

This guide will help you look at those layers together. We will begin with human nature and perception, move into the stories and personalities that shape what people want, and then examine how those truths become a brand, a website, and a lived experience. The goal is not to turn your audience into a formula or to make your business look like somebody else's. The goal is to see the signal you are already sending, understand who is receiving it, and decide what you want to build next.

CHAPTER 1

The Person Behind the Purchase

A customer is not a blank page waiting for your logo or your marketing message to tell them what to think. People meet a brand with a body, a history, a set of expectations, a role they are playing, and a life that continues after they close your website. Those realities influence what they notice and what they are ready to do.

When we talk about biology in Neuro Human Branding®, we are not saying that one brain fact explains every purchase. We are recognizing that human beings have bodies and minds that respond to their surroundings before they can fully explain every response. People have limited attention. They draw on previous experience. They react to uncertainty, effort, familiarity, and the context in which a choice appears. They also stop, reconsider, ask questions, and make deliberate decisions. The point is not that people are irrational. The point is that a brand reaches a whole person, not just the person’s spreadsheet.

This distinction matters because marketing often treats information as if it automatically becomes understanding. A business can list every feature and still leave people uncertain. It can use polished language and still fail to show what a client should expect. It can put a beautiful image on a page and still make the next step hard to find.

A brand may be easy to understand in one context and difficult to trust in another. Clear language can help a person orient themselves, but clarity alone cannot undo a poor experience or make a promise credible. Context matters: the meaning people attach to a signal shapes how they receive it.

A useful question for a founder is not, “How can I trigger someone’s brain?” It is, “What is this person likely to encounter, notice, infer, and need next?” That question brings the work back to respect. You are not trying to bypass judgment. You are trying to understand the conditions in which a person can recognize relevance, evaluate what you offer, and decide whether a relationship makes sense.

The First Experience Is Already Underway

Before someone reads the about page, they may have seen a social post, heard a recommendation, noticed the name in an event program, or searched for the business. They might arrive with a question already formed. They might be skeptical because another organization has disappointed them. They might have very little time. They might be looking for one concrete detail, such as who qualifies, how much something costs, whether the service is accessible, or how to get in touch.

Even someone who has never heard of your business arrives with a view of the industry, the problem they are trying to solve, and what a solution might cost or require. Their biology, earlier experiences, social stories, personality, and expectations all influence how they interpret what they encounter. Some of those influences may not be easy for them to explain in the moment.

The first encounter is shaped by what they bring and what you have made available. You cannot know every person’s history, and you should not pretend that one visual cue has the same meaning for every viewer. You can make the next part easier to understand. You can use direct language. You can show what the organization does and for whom. You can make the next step visible. You can ensure the image, words, and process are not contradicting one another.

A website that says “we are here for you” but hides the contact information asks the visitor to resolve a contradiction. A premium service that never explains what is included makes the prospective client carry unnecessary uncertainty. A nonprofit that describes its mission in abstract language but gives no concrete account of whom it serves leaves a donor to guess. The brand is communicating through those gaps too.

Not every question needs to be answered on the first screen. The reader does need to understand where they are and how to move forward. Think of the website as the beginning of a conversation, even when no one is speaking aloud. What is the person trying to learn? What do they need to believe before they will continue? What should they be able to do from here?

Human Nature Is Not A Conversion Trick

There is a line between designing for people and manipulating people. Designing for people means recognizing that attention, comprehension, trust, and effort matter. Manipulation means hiding relevant facts, manufacturing pressure, or using a person’s vulnerability to push a decision that does not serve them.

A clear brand respects the decision. It lets the person understand the offer, the conditions, and the next step. It makes value visible without promising more than the business can deliver. It helps the person decide whether this is the right relationship for them.

For a founder, this standard has another benefit. It creates a stronger basis for the relationship that follows. If the marketing creates expectations the organization cannot meet, a sale may happen, but the experience begins with a debt. If the message accurately describes the work, the client and the team can begin with clearer expectations.

This is why Neuro Human Branding® starts with the human being, but it does not end with a psychological insight. The biology layer asks us to respect the fact that people do not receive information in a vacuum. The psychology and social story layer asks what this information means to this particular person. The brand layer asks what we will actually build and deliver in response.

CHAPTER 2

The Founder and the Audience Both Belong

Many founders are told to put the customer first. The advice is well intentioned, but incomplete. If you build an organization around what you assume the audience wants while ignoring what gives you energy, purpose, and commitment, you can create a business you do not want to represent. You may avoid selling it. You may keep adding work that gives you the kind of connection you miss. You may grow resentful of the very people you set out to serve.

The opposite mistake is equally real. If you build only around what you personally like, you may ask the audience to care about details that matter more to you than to them. You may build a message that reflects your history but leaves them unsure whether the organization understands theirs.

A strong brand needs the founder and team in the room, and it needs the person who cares enough to engage with the business. The founder and team have to be able to stand behind the promise and deliver it. The customer, client, donor, member, or community has to recognize that the organization understands what matters to them. The point is not to make one side perform for the other. It is to build a relationship both sides can honestly say yes to.

Put The Founder In The Picture

Your preferences are not a problem to erase. They are part of the material you have to work with. You may love thoughtful conversation and want your clients to feel known. You may prefer efficient systems because you do not want people waiting for an answer. You may value beauty because your work asks people to imagine a future they have not experienced yet. The preference becomes strategically relevant when it shapes how the organization serves.

The question is not, “Should I get what I want, or should the audience get what it wants?” That framing makes the two sides compete before you understand what either side truly needs. Ask instead: What parts of the work make me feel most useful? Which clients or customers do I look forward to meeting? What kind of work do I want more of? What do people consistently come to me for? Where do those answers meet?

A founder might value deep personal relationships and build a service model that depends almost entirely on automation. Automation may make the organization more efficient, but if it removes every human connection that gives the founder meaning, the founder may begin creating extra work to restore that connection. The result can be a confusing experience for clients and a frustrating management problem for the team.

The answer is not to reject automation. The answer is to decide what kind of relationship the organization promises, then choose where automation supports it and where it interrupts it. An automated reminder may help the person feel informed. An automated response that gives no way to reach a person may communicate that the relationship is not what the founder says it is.

If your brand’s stated values and your preferred way of serving pull in opposite directions, the tension will surface somewhere. It may show up in the offer, the client experience, the team structure, or the way you sell. The earlier you notice it, the more options you have.

You Cannot Assume The Audience Is You

Founders are often close to their own work. They know what it took to create the service. They know why the name matters. They know what they mean by a phrase they have used for years. That familiarity is useful and can also create blind spots. You may assume a client understands the offer because you understand it. You may assume a donor trusts the organization because you know how carefully it is run. You may assume a customer wants what you wanted when you first started.

A Niche Is Not A Person

Niches and customer avatars are often presented as shortcuts to understanding people. A niche can help you choose where your business can serve well. A customer profile can help you organize questions to investigate. But neither one is a human being. The trouble starts when a sketch becomes a script and you begin writing for an idealized customer who always knows what they need, has the money ready, and never hesitates at the checkout. That person is convenient. They are also imaginary. Your real audience includes people with doubts, constraints, competing priorities, imperfect information, and different reasons for deciding. Do not sell to a polished version of who you wish they were. Speak to the people who are actually there, learn what matters to them, and make a promise your business can keep.

The founder is not a neutral observer of the brand. That is true even when the founder is an expert in branding. Being experienced does not remove the emotional closeness. It may make the founder faster at recognizing possible solutions, while making it harder to feel the uncertainty a new visitor would feel.

Your customer is not a spreadsheet with a pulse. You are always speaking to a person with a real day, a real history, limited time, and reasons for saying yes, no, or “let me think about it.” A useful audience focus helps you listen better; it does not let you skip listening.

That is why audience understanding needs more than demographic facts. Age, job title, income, geography, or military affiliation can help define the people a business can serve. Those facts do not tell you what the audience fears, hopes for, resents, or needs to believe before taking a step. They do not tell you whether the person wants reassurance, directness, privacy, flexibility, expertise, or time to think.

You can learn more by listening for the emotional job beneath the practical request. Someone who asks for a website may be asking for credibility. A donor asking about overhead may be asking whether their gift will make a difference. A prospective client who asks how the process works may be trying to understand how much control they will retain. These are interpretations to explore, not conclusions to impose. The words are clues. You have to ask and observe.

Use Real Language And Real Behavior

A client can tell you what they value. Their behavior can tell you what the current experience makes easy or difficult. If people repeatedly ask for a step that is already explained on the website, the explanation may not be visible enough, or it may use language the audience does not recognize. If people leave a process before completing it, the cause may be price, timing, trust, access, confusion, or something else. Do not assign the cause before you have evidence.

Start with a recent interaction. What did the person ask for? What did they say mattered? What did they do next? What was the practical obstacle? What emotional concern might be present? Which parts do you know, and which parts are your interpretation? This last distinction is important. It keeps empathy from turning into projection.

If you are interviewing clients, ask about the moment before they chose you. What were they comparing? What worried them? What did they need to see before they felt ready? What did they expect the relationship to feel like? Then ask what actually happened. The distance between expectation and experience is where brand clarity either grows or breaks down.

Do not ask clients to design your brand. They are there to explain their needs and experiences. You are there to translate what you learn into a promise and an experience the organization can deliver. That translation requires judgment.

If a person asks for a feature that does not fit your values or capacity, you can decline it. Listening does not mean saying yes to every request.

The Founder And Audience Must Both Be Able To Say Yes

Imagine you are in a room talking to the kind of person you most want to serve. Are you interested in what they care about? Does your work help with something you genuinely want to address? Can you explain the value without feeling like you have to become someone else? Would you want a colleague or team member to represent this brand?

Now imagine the audience meeting the business. Can they tell whom it is for? Do they understand the value? Do the visuals and words make sense for the kind of relationship they are being asked to enter? Does the organization appear capable of delivering what it promises?

A mismatch on either side matters. If the founder does not feel connected, the brand will become difficult to advocate for. If the audience cannot recognize its need in the offer, the founder's enthusiasm may not translate into a relationship. The brand is the work of bringing both sides into view.

That may mean preserving a founder's favorite color because it carries a meaningful part of the brand, while changing how that color is used so the full visual system supports legibility and audience fit. It may mean keeping the name but reworking the verbal identity. It may mean changing the service because the way the organization wants to serve is different from the way it currently operates. The right decision is not always the most dramatic redesign. It is the decision that makes the relationship more honest and more understandable.

Return to the nonprofit in the opening. The founder had built a brand she loved. That emotional connection was real. So was the audience the organization needed to serve. The brand work could not succeed by dismissing either truth. The team kept some meaningful elements and reworked what was no longer serving the broader audience. The founder initially embraced the work, then decided she did not want to make the change. At that point, the ethical choice was to say what the event could and could not accomplish under the existing conditions.

The story makes an uncomfortable point: sometimes the immediate barrier to growth is not lack of effort or lack of talent. It is a decision the founder is not ready to make. A brand strategist can help make the implications visible. The founder still has to choose.

If you can see that your own preferences and your audience’s expectations are pulling in different directions, Neuroiety®’s Neuro Human Branding® questions can help you explore what is underneath that tension. If you want help turning those answers into a brand and experience you can actually deliver, we can help you put the pieces together.

CHAPTER 3

What They Mean Before They Say It

No one arrives at a brand without a story. Some of that story is personal. Some of it comes from family, culture, community, work, identity, and the roles a person has learned to play. Some of it changes over time. Together, these experiences influence what a person sees as trustworthy, excessive, warm, credible, threatening, or worth their effort.

This is the psychology and social story layer of Neuro Human Branding®. It includes the beliefs people carry, the relationships they have experienced, the language they use to understand their role, and the personality patterns that shape how they show up. A client may not describe these influences in the language of psychology. They may say, “I need to know exactly what happens next,” or “I need to talk to a person before I decide,” or “I don't want to be treated like I don't understand my own business.” Those statements are useful. They tell you something about the relationship they need.

A person's preferences are not universal truths. Someone who wants structure is not automatically cold or unimaginative. Someone who values relationships is not automatically indecisive. Someone who wants to move quickly is not always careless. The social story helps explain why the same brand signal can land differently with different people.

What The Audience Says Is A Beginning

People do not always have ready-made words for what they need. They may begin with the request they can name: a logo, an event, a website, more leads. That request matters, but it may be only the visible edge of a deeper need. A founder asking for a new logo may be trying to feel credible in a business that has outgrown its identity. A nonprofit asking for an event may need clearer positioning, a stronger donor pathway, and an experience that earns trust. The expert's role is to hear the request, ask what the person hopes it will make possible, and understand the context before recommending the work.

People rarely choose a service because they want a transaction for its own sake. A practical decision can also carry a human hope: more confidence, relief, control, belonging, momentum, or the chance to do something that matters. You cannot guess which one is true. You can ask, listen, and use your expertise to connect what the person says with what they are trying to change.

Imagine someone shopping for jeans. She may say she needs a pair of jeans, but what she hopes for might be a fit that makes her feel confident, comfortable, or more like herself. She may want to feel lifted, balanced, or good in the mirror. The product is denim; the value lives in the transformation she expects to feel. She may not describe that hope directly. Your job is to understand what matters to her without assuming you already know.

The point is not that people are wrong about what they want. It is that what they ask for and what they need may be connected at a different level. When the request seems too small for the desired outcome, ask what the person expects that request to make possible. When the request seems broad or vague, ask what they are trying to change in their life, work, or relationship with the problem.

A brand strategist must be able to hear both the request and the context. If a client asks for an event, ask what the event is expected to accomplish. Is it awareness, revenue, donor trust, community, recruitment, or a commitment to the mission? If the desired result is large, what does the organization need to have in place before the event? Where does the website fit? Who needs to recognize themselves in the invitation? What should a person be able to do before, during, and after the event?

Those questions are not a way to force a client into your preferred solution. They are a way to make the relationship between the desired result and the work visible. Sometimes the event really is the right priority. Sometimes another piece must come first. A sound recommendation explains the connection and lets the client make an informed choice.

Context Changes What A Signal Means

The same phrase can sound welcoming to one person and vague to another. “We meet you where you are” may communicate care, or leave a person wondering what service is actually available. “Premium experience” can signal attention and quality when the brand shows what that means. But when the phrase has been repeated everywhere, it can go thin; a prospective client may hear a price tag without a reason to trust the value. “We are here to help” may feel reassuring, or hollow if there is no clear way to reach someone.

Meaning depends on more than the words. It depends on context, experience, expectation, and the relationship the audience believes it is entering. A person who has been dismissed by organizations may need evidence that they will be heard. A business buyer who has been oversold may need clear scope and boundaries. A donor may need an honest account of the organization's capacity, not a sweeping promise.

This is where a brand can become more specific without becoming narrow. You do not need to write a separate personality into every message. You do need to understand the conditions in which your audience will encounter it. What do they know already? What do they have reason to distrust? What decisions are they facing? What could make the relationship easier to enter?

The founder's social story matters here too. A brand built from personal history can carry unusual insight. It can also carry assumptions the audience does not share. A founder might believe a certain look feels elegant because it reminds her of brands she admires. Her audience might see it as distant or unrelated to the service. The difference is not proof that the founder should surrender her taste. It is information to consider alongside her desire to represent the brand and the audience's experience.

Personality Helps You Understand A Relationship

Personality is not a script. It is a way to notice patterns in how someone tends to think, connect, respond, and move through the world. In your own work, NERI® gives people a language for understanding those patterns. It helps a person consider their own preferences, triggers, habits, perspective, energy, and relationship style. It can also help them pay more attention to the patterns of the people they serve.

That second use deserves care. A profile can be a starting point for curiosity. It should not become a shortcut that replaces listening. If you think a client may want a particular kind of information, ask what they need. If you think a person values warmth, do not assume the only way to show warmth is to use a sentimental tone. If you recognize a pattern in yourself, ask whether it serves this relationship or gets in the way.

The NERI® framework recognizes four core profiles associated with New York, Seattle, Boston, and Charleston. In the current NERI® materials, these profile names help describe differing patterns and perspectives. They also allow people to examine how a blend of tendencies may shape their experience. The model is personal and relational. It is about understanding yourself and the other person well enough to choose how you want to connect.

For a brand, that creates two important questions: What kind of relationship can the founder honestly sustain? What kind of relationship is the audience seeking? The answer may shape the tone of the site, the amount of detail on a page, the way offers are presented, the space available for conversation, and the kind of follow-up that feels appropriate. These are design decisions rooted in human understanding.

Do Not Stereotype The Audience

A profile is not a permission slip to predict, manipulate, or flatten someone. A person may show different traits in different settings. A founder may be decisive with a team and cautious in a personal purchase. A client may need details about a financial commitment and move quickly on a decision they have made many times before. Context, intention, people, and energy all matter.

The NERI® Content material identifies four keys that can help people consider a relationship: situation, intention, people, and energy. Those are not four steps in a brand formula. They are reminders that personality does not happen in a vacuum. Before interpreting someone's behavior, look at the situation they are in, what they are trying to accomplish, who else is part of the interaction, and what energy or pressure is shaping the moment.

A person who seems short in a meeting may be focused on the deadline, worried about the budget, or simply communicating directly. If you turn one moment into a fixed personality judgment, you may miss the real issue. If you ask an open, relevant question, you may discover what they need from you. In a sales conversation, that could be, "Would it help if I walked through the scope first, or would you rather start with the outcome you want?" In a design review, it could be, "Which part feels most like your organization, and which part feels hardest to step into?"

This is an advantage of NERI® in a Neuro Human Branding® process: it gives the founder a way to consider both self and other. It does not remove the work of conversation. It makes the questions more attentive.

That is one reason NERI® sits inside the larger Neuro Human Branding® work. The questions help you look at your own patterns and the people you serve, then decide how to communicate in a way that feels relevant without reducing anyone to a profile.

CHAPTER 4

Know Yourself and the People You Serve

Neuro Human Branding® includes the relationship between your nature and the people who encounter your brand. NERI® is useful within that picture because it gives people a structured way to understand personal and relational patterns. The point is not to assign each person a box. The point is to help you notice how people may differ in what they value, what they expect, and how they respond.

Your NERI® profile matters because it influences how you naturally communicate and serve. The audience’s profile matters because a brand is interpreted by people whose preferences and perspectives may differ from yours. When you understand both sides, you can make more deliberate choices about the relationship.

The Four Profiles Are Starting Points

NERI® uses the profiles New York, Seattle, Boston, and Charleston. The names are not instructions to turn people into caricatures. They are a common vocabulary for examining tendencies and patterns. The profiles are also blended. A person may lead with one profile in a given situation and show other dimensions in another part of life.

In broad strokes, someone leaning New York may be drawn to possibility and changing what is possible. Someone leaning Seattle may want to know how a choice will help them reach a goal. Someone leaning Boston may want the checklist, the details, and a direct answer. Someone leaning Charleston may want to know who they are building a relationship with. These are starting points for paying attention, not labels to impose. The same person can bring different needs to different situations, and the only way to know what matters in a particular conversation is to listen.

That matters for branding. A founder might assume that everyone wants the same level of detail because that is how the founder makes decisions. A prospective customer may want a clear summary first and details later. Another may need to see the process before they can trust the result. A third may want to understand who will be involved and how communication will work. A brand that provides only one route into the decision may make some people do more work than others.

The profiles are not a substitute for observing the actual audience. They are a lens that can help you ask better questions. When a pattern seems to appear, test your interpretation. Ask what matters to the person. Ask what they need from the relationship. Notice how they respond to different kinds of communication.

The same care applies when interpreting yourself. You may identify with one profile strongly and still behave differently under pressure, in a new environment, or in a role that demands something of you. Profile insight gives you a chance to choose differently. It should expand your options rather than excuse behavior or limit your identity.

Relationship Context Matters

NERI® identifies situation, intention, people, and energy as four keys to understanding a moment. These keys are useful in business because the same person may bring different needs to different interactions.

A client reviewing a proposal may focus on risk and expectations. The same client at an informal event may be more interested in connection and conversation. A team member who appears quiet in a group meeting may be processing a decision or may have a different way of contributing. A founder who is direct in a strategy conversation may be warmer and more exploratory when discussing the mission.

Before you make an assumption, look at the situation. What is happening right now? What is the person trying to accomplish? Who else is part of the interaction? What energy has the person brought into it, and what energy is the organization creating? This pause can prevent you from treating a momentary reaction as a fixed truth about someone.

For a brand, these keys can help you design a better sequence. A person who is first encountering your business may need a simple introduction. A person who is comparing options may need specifics. Someone who has already chosen you may need reassurance about what happens next. A long-term client may need a new kind of conversation because the relationship has changed.

This approach keeps NERI® connected to actual behavior. It lets you think in profiles while remaining responsive to the person in front of you.

Let The Founder Profile Inform The Brand

A founder's profile may shape the way they naturally make decisions, communicate, organize, or build relationships. That can be a strength. It can also create blind spots. A person who values structure may assume that a detailed process is the best kind of care. Someone who leads with relationships may assume that a personal conversation is always the most welcoming route. Someone who moves quickly may assume that a fast decision is the most confident decision.

If you recognize your own tendency, you can decide when it serves the brand and when it needs balancing. You do not have to pretend to be someone else. You do need to recognize when your natural style is becoming the only style the organization can support.

Consider the nonprofit founder in the opening. Her attachment to the original brand made sense. She had built it herself. That investment was part of her story. The brand change asked her to consider a broader audience and the donor relationship. The design team needed to preserve enough emotional continuity that the organization could still feel like hers, while making a new identity that could make sense to people who did not share her history.

Another pattern I see often with women founders is a strength that can become expensive when it has no support around it. A founder who is naturally relational may be excellent at building trust, but find it hard to name her price without softening it, discounting it, or adding extra work. We do not ask her to become less caring. We build tools that carry the parts of the conversation she finds harder: a clear pricing page, a proposal or pitch deck that states the fee and scope, and a simple explanation of what happens next. Then she can bring her relationship-building strength to the conversation without carrying the whole sales process in her head.

That is the difference between honoring a founder and centering every decision on the founder. The founder must be able to live with the brand. The audience must be able to understand it. NERI® can help the founder notice where her preferences and the audience's expectations align, differ, or require another conversation.

Do Not Profile Your Way Around Asking

A profile is a starting point for understanding, not a substitute for learning who someone is. The moment you decide you already know what a person wants, you stop listening. That can make a brand feel eerily presumptuous or completely wrong.

Use profile insight to generate possibilities: “This person may want detail before making a decision.” “This person may be looking for a relationship before discussing the offer.” “This person may want me to get to the point.”

Then ask or observe. A good question gives the other person room to correct your assumption.

This also protects your own brand from over-customization. You do not need a separate logo, website, and process for every profile. You need a clear core, thoughtful options for how people enter the relationship, and enough awareness to adapt the conversation without changing the promise.

The NERI® quizzes on Psychiety™ can help you begin noticing your own patterns and preferences. Use them as a prompt for self-understanding, then keep paying attention to the actual person and situation in front of you. Explore the NERI® quizzes at PsychietyInc.com.

The website can offer a direct path for people who want the key information, with a clear way to speak to a person if they need a conversation. A proposal can make scope and next steps easy to scan while including enough detail for someone who wants to evaluate the investment. A service can use repeatable systems without making every client feel interchangeable. Those are strategic choices based on people, not tricks aimed at profiles.

CHAPTER 5

Build a Brand People Can Feel

After looking at biology, psychology, social story, and personality, we can ask what to build. The brand is the place where your understanding of people becomes a visible and verbal relationship. It gives the audience a way to recognize the organization, understand its perspective, and decide whether to move closer.

The brand includes visual identity, language, offers, service behavior, and the experience of interacting with the organization. The logo is part of it, but the logo cannot carry the entire promise. The website cannot make a poor service experience disappear. A strong event cannot permanently compensate for a confusing organization. Each piece has a role, and the pieces need to support one another.

Visuals Are Not Decoration

Visual choices help establish a tone and create recognition. They can signal energy, restraint, warmth, precision, innovation, tradition, or something else. These signals are not universal codes. A color does not mean the same thing to every person in every context. A particular typeface does not automatically make a business trustworthy. The meaning comes from how choices work together with the words, context, audience, and experience.

That is why a visual identity should begin with the people and the promise, not a favorite color in isolation. Ask what the audience needs to recognize. Ask what the organization wants to be known for. Ask what visual qualities can support those meanings. Then test whether the system works across the places the audience will encounter it.

A mark may look beautiful on a slide and fail at a small size. A palette may contain colors the founder loves but lack enough contrast for people to read the website. A high-end visual system may imply an exclusive service when the organization is trying to communicate access. A playful identity may make a serious service feel approachable, or it may undermine the expertise people need to trust.

The answer is not to follow a rigid rulebook. It is to know what each choice is doing and whether it helps the audience make sense of the relationship.

Words Tell People What The Brand Means

A visual identity can invite attention. The words need to explain what happens next. Your brand language should make the offer legible, distinguish the organization from alternatives, and give the audience a reason to care. It should sound like a person with a point of view, not a collection of phrases chosen because they appear in every competitor's marketing.

Start by explaining the offer in the language a client would use to describe the problem. Then explain what your business does, how it helps, and what the client can expect from the relationship. Avoid claiming outcomes you cannot guarantee. Avoid using specialized terms before you have explained what they mean. Avoid asking the audience to decode the importance of the work.

A simple message can still carry complexity. It can tell people whom you serve, what you help them do, and why your approach matters. The underlying work may be sophisticated. The audience should not have to understand your internal process before they can see whether it is relevant.

The relationship between verbal and visual identity matters. If your language is warm but the design feels cold, the audience may sense the mismatch. If your words are direct but the page is cluttered and hard to navigate, the experience asks for more effort than the promise suggests. When the visuals and words work together, the audience can spend more attention understanding the value instead of reconciling contradictions.

The Brand Is A Relationship, And The Offer Gives It A Reason

A brand creates the context for a relationship between a person and an organization. The offer gives that relationship a practical reason to begin. A person may be drawn to the mission, the values, the style, or the trust they feel in the organization. They still need to understand what they are buying, joining, supporting, or asking for.

This distinction can help a business clarify what it is selling. People do not buy a logo, a philosophy, or a brand promise by itself. They choose a product, service, event, or opportunity because they believe it connects to a need or desire. The brand can make that choice more meaningful, but it cannot replace the value of the offer.

For a nonprofit, the donor relationship may begin with shared values. The practical reason for support might be funding a program, reaching a community, or sustaining an organization’s work. The brand helps the donor understand why this organization is the right place for their support. The organization then has to show what it can responsibly do with that support.

For a service business, the relationship may begin with a sense that the founder understands the client. The service provides the practical reason to work together. If the client cannot understand the service, the emotional connection may not be enough to make the investment clear. If the service is clear but the brand has no human resonance, the decision may feel transactional and interchangeable.

The goal is not to make every interaction emotionally intense. It is to create a relationship that fits the work. The brand should help the audience recognize what kind of relationship is available, and the offer should deliver a reason to enter it.

Define The Promise And The Proof

A useful brand promise does not have to be a slogan. It can be a clear internal standard that guides decisions. What should people consistently experience when they work with you? What can you reasonably promise? What proof can you show? Where are the limits?

If you promise clarity, show how the process makes decisions clearer. If you promise personal attention, specify how and when people can reach a person. If you promise speed, identify the timelines you can meet. If you promise a particular financial outcome, ask whether you can truly guarantee it. In most cases, the responsible promise describes the work and the support, not a guaranteed result outside your control.

The audience needs proof proportionate to the claim. Proof might include a case study, a clear process, a sample, a portfolio, an experienced team, a transparent policy, a demonstrated outcome, or a relevant credential. The proof should support the statement, not decorate it.

In the nonprofit story, a six-figure event was the desired result. The brand and website were part of the path to donor understanding and participation. But no website can guarantee a six-figure outcome. A responsible brand strategy can make the mission clearer, make giving easier, and build a stronger case for support. It cannot promise a number the organization has not earned or proven.

CHAPTER 6

The Website Is the Relationship in Action

For the businesses I work with, the website is where I start. That is not because every customer begins there. Some people hear about a business through a friend, a social platform, a podcast, or an event. The website is still the most useful foundation for bringing the visual and verbal identity together and showing what the organization wants the relationship to be.

When the website is clear, it becomes easier to build the other assets. The language can inform social posts. The visuals can guide event materials. The offer can be described consistently across a proposal, a presentation, and an email. The team can use the same core explanation when responding to inquiries. Instead of inventing a new message every time, the organization has a source to build from.

Start With The Visitor's Reason For Being There

Do not build the website only around the organization’s internal structure. The visitor does not necessarily know the names of your programs, the way your team divides its work, or why a particular page matters to you. They arrive with a question or task. The site should help them find the path that serves it.

A nonprofit might need to reach participants, donors, partners, volunteers, and the press. Those groups do not all need the same first page. The home page can introduce the organization and make the main paths visible. Each audience can then find what it needs without being forced to interpret an internal org chart.

A service business may need to explain a range of offerings. A potential client should be able to distinguish them. A page that lists several services with similar descriptions makes the visitor do the positioning work. A page that names the problem, explains what each option includes, and shows the next step helps the visitor decide what to explore.

When reviewing a website, look at the hierarchy. What does the page make important? What information appears first? What can be scanned? What requires more attention? Where does the page lead? These are design decisions, but they are also decisions about the relationship. A well organized site respects the fact that people arrive with different levels of familiarity and different amounts of time.

The Website Is Not A Brochure

An overglorified brochure can list services, credentials, and industry facts and still leave a visitor asking why they should choose this organization. People usually arrive because they already need something from the industry. The website has to help them see why they might relate to this organization, trust its people, agree with its approach, or feel understood by its point of view. Facts matter when they support that connection. Without the human meaning, the site is an information page competing with Google and leaves the relationship for someone else to create.

This does not mean every page should have a large button demanding a purchase. It means the visitor should understand what action is available and what will happen after they take it. A person who gives their email address should know what they will receive. Someone who submits an application should know how the organization will respond. A donor should know whether the donation is one-time or recurring and where the gift goes.

A website can also set boundaries. If a service is not a fit for someone, say so with care. If a program has eligibility criteria, make them visible. If a consultation is not a guarantee of acceptance, explain what the conversation is for. Clear boundaries are part of a trustworthy experience.

Use The Site As A Source Of Truth

When a website is treated as the foundation, it can make the rest of the work more consistent. Before creating another social campaign or event asset, return to the site. What message should the asset echo? What page will the visitor land on? Does that page answer the question the post raises? Is the offer still current? Are the colors, type, and tone part of a coherent system?

This matters because a business can create beautiful individual pieces that do not add up. A social post points one way, the website another. An event page uses an old logo. A proposal describes a service that has changed. A donor email asks for support but links to a page with no clear giving options. Every time the organization makes a new asset without checking the source, it adds a chance for the audience to encounter mixed signals.

The website also provides useful discipline for the team. If the service cannot be explained on the website, it may not yet be clear enough to market. If the team cannot agree on who a program serves, the page will show that uncertainty. If the organization is divided about its promise, the words will become vague. These are strategic questions the website helps surface.

Keep The Human Relationship Visible

A website can use automation and still feel human. The question is whether the technology is serving the relationship or hiding the people behind it. A form can make it easier to gather the right information. An automatic confirmation can reassure the person that their message arrived. A scheduling link can reduce back-and-forth. Each can be useful.

The experience becomes frustrating when the person cannot tell what happens next, cannot reach a human when needed, or has to repeat information because systems do not connect. The founder may see efficient automation; the visitor may experience being passed from one step to another without context.

This is where your personal preference should influence the design. If you value relationships, decide where those relationships should happen in the journey. Maybe the first step is self-serve, followed by a personal conversation. Maybe clients can choose whether to book directly or send a question. Maybe donors receive an immediate thank-you and a later report showing the impact of their gift. The exact model depends on the organization. What matters is that the site makes the kind of relationship visible.

If the ideas in this chapter are helping you see the gap between the brand you intend and the experience people actually have, our Neuro Human Branding® questions are a useful next step. If you want support translating what you learn into your message, visuals, website, and service experience, we can help you execute that work.

CHAPTER 7

When the Brand No Longer Fits

Changing a brand can feel like admitting that the original work was wrong. That is not necessarily what the change means. The organization may have changed. The audience may have changed. The original identity may have solved a problem at the time and be less useful now. A new brand can carry forward what matters while making different choices about how it is expressed.

Established brands update their identities. That fact alone is not an argument for changing yours. The reason to change is that a real part of the relationship is no longer working. Perhaps people do not understand the offer. Perhaps the identity speaks to a narrower audience than the organization now serves. Perhaps the visual system cannot support the media or experience the business needs. Perhaps the founder's own understanding of the organization has evolved.

Separate What Matters From What Is Familiar

When a founder says, “I love this,” do not dismiss the statement. Ask what they love. Is it the color, the memory of creating it, the meaning of the name, a specific symbol, or the freedom of having made it themselves? Once you know what the element represents, you can determine whether that meaning can remain while its expression changes.

In the nonprofit story, we kept some elements because they carried emotional meaning for the founder. We changed other parts because the organization needed to speak to a broader audience and donors. That was the balance the work required. The founder was initially excited by the result, then decided she did not want to proceed. Her change of mind did not make the work meaningless. It revealed that she was not ready to release the old identity.

A brand strategist should not force a client to change. The responsibility is to explain what is at stake, show what the alternatives could mean, and let the client choose. A client may decide to retain the original identity and accept the consequences. That is their choice. The strategist also has a responsibility to decide what work they can honestly do within those conditions.

“Small” Changes Can Be Strategic

Not every change needs to be a complete rebrand. Sometimes a clearer headline, better page order, more direct offer description, stronger photography, or a more accessible color combination can solve the problem. Sometimes the name is working but the logo, colors, or supporting message need attention. Sometimes the business needs to update the service itself before it can update the brand.

The scale of change should match the scale of the problem. A small shift is not automatically timid. A complete redesign is not automatically strategic. Ask what the change needs to accomplish and what evidence would tell you the current system cannot do that.

A brand can also change in stages. The organization may first clarify its message, then revise the website, then update supporting assets. That sequence can protect continuity while allowing the team to learn. The important thing is that the stages lead toward a shared direction rather than leaving the audience to encounter different versions indefinitely.

Growth Requires Permission To Evolve

People can feel loyal to the brand they helped create. They may think changing it will confuse existing supporters or erase history. Those concerns deserve attention. A change should preserve important recognition and explain what remains true. If the organization is changing its name, mission, or audience, tell people why. If the visual identity is changing while the mission remains, help the audience see the continuity.

Evolution also creates an opportunity. A brand can show that the organization is paying attention to the world it serves. It can make a broader audience feel invited. It can make a more mature business feel credible. It can help the team see a clearer future.

The question is not whether you can afford to change. It is whether you can afford to keep sending a signal that no longer supports the relationship you want.

Practice Pages

Use these prompts to turn the ideas in the guide into decisions you can make in your own business. You do not need perfect answers. Start with what you know, mark what you are assuming, and choose one thing to learn next.

The one-page questionnaire in the earlier draft asked people to state what they want their brand to communicate. You are right to challenge that approach. People often answer in the language they think a brand owner is supposed to use. They say they want to be trusted, respected, authentic, and high quality. Those answers are not wrong. They are too abstract to guide a decision.

A more useful process begins with lived moments. Instead of asking a person to describe an ideal brand in general, ask them to recall a time they felt connected to their work, a time they felt misunderstood, a customer conversation that stayed with them, or a choice they made even though it was difficult. Specific memories reveal values and patterns people may not name when asked to list values directly.

Exercise One: The Work You Want More Of

There is a reason I ask about moments instead of starting with “What are your values?” Put someone in a business conversation and they may give you the answer they think a capable founder is supposed to give: growth, quality, service, innovation. Those words can be true. They can also be the business hat doing most of the talking. Ask about the client conversation they still remember, the work they would happily do again, or the moment they felt useful, and you are more likely to hear what actually gives the work meaning. People do not always know how to name their motivation on command. That is not dishonesty. It is being human.

Think of three client or customer interactions that left you energized. Do not choose only the most profitable or prestigious projects. Choose the ones that made you feel useful and interested. For each, write down:

What was the person trying to make happen?

What did they bring into the conversation, beyond the information on the intake form?

What did you find yourself asking, noticing, or caring about?

Which part of your work mattered most to you in that moment?

What happened that made you think, “This is the kind of work I want more of”?

Now think of one interaction that drained you. Describe the same details. Was the problem the person, the process, the expectation, the boundary, or the way the service had been designed? Be honest without making one difficult interaction into a rule about an entire audience.

Look across the examples. Do you see a pattern in the kind of work you enjoy? Is there a specific relationship you want more of? Does your current brand invite those people and projects? Does the offer help the team deliver that kind of work?

Exercise Two: The Moment The Audience Recognized Itself

Recall a time someone told you, directly or indirectly, that your organization understood them. What did you say or do? What did they say or do? What made the interaction different from a routine transaction? What was the person facing before they met you? What became possible after?

Do not turn the example into a testimonial yet. First, look at the structure of the moment. Was it a phrase, a question, an explanation, a visual detail, a boundary, or a specific service action? Did the person feel recognized because you named their problem, or because you gave them room to explain it? Did the interaction offer relief, confidence, direction, or belonging?

This exercise helps distinguish your internal description of the brand from what the audience experiences. The brand may claim to be supportive. The real moment may show that the support comes from listening without rushing to a solution. That discovery can change how you write the site, structure a service, or train a team.

Exercise Three: The Audience You Can Actually Serve

Take one audience segment you are trying to reach. Write a recent situation that person may be in. Do not begin with an age range or a job title. Begin with the problem and the choice they have to make. What do they already know? What are they uncertain about? What might they fear losing? What would help them decide whether the relationship is right?

Now write what you know from actual conversations, behavior, or data. Mark your interpretation separately. If you do not have evidence, list what you need to learn. This makes it easier to avoid treating your assumptions as client insight.

Ask what you can responsibly promise this audience. What can your organization provide consistently? What is outside your control? What would make the relationship work for both sides? If the audience needs a service you do not provide, say so. If the people you want to reach have different needs, decide whether your business can serve them through one coherent offer or needs distinct pathways.

Exercise Four: The Founder And Audience Conversation

Imagine explaining your business to a person you admire and genuinely want to help. What part of the explanation comes easily? Where do you start defending, apologizing, or using jargon? What do you hope they understand about why this work matters?

Then imagine the person describing the experience back to you. What do they say the business does? Which part of the offer stands out? What do they think will happen after they say yes? Where might they misunderstand the promise?

Write both versions. You may find the difference between what you intend and what is visible. You may also find the part of the work that you do not actually want to sell. Either discovery gives you something to decide before you invest further in design or marketing.

Exercise Five: NERI® In A Real Interaction

Choose a recent interaction with a client, colleague, team member, or donor. Consider the situation, intention, people, and energy. What was happening? What did each person seem to want? Who else was influencing the interaction? What emotional or practical pressure was present?

Now consider your own natural response. Did you become more direct, more detailed, more accommodating, quieter, or more controlling? What did that response help? What might it have made harder? If you have a NERI® profile insight, consider what it helps you notice about your own tendency. Do not use the profile to excuse your behavior. Use it to choose your next response.

Finally, look at the other person. What did they ask for? What did they actually do? What would you need to ask before deciding what their behavior meant? How could the brand or process make the next interaction clearer for both of you?

This exercise does not produce a diagnosis of the other person. It helps you become more thoughtful about the relationship. That distinction matters in sales, team leadership, client work, and brand development.

Exercise Six: The Website As A Relationship Map

Choose the page that most often introduces people to the business. Ask someone who is not close to the organization to look at it for a few minutes. Do not explain the page first. Ask what they think the organization offers, who it seems to serve, and what they would do next. Note their words.

Then ask what felt credible, what raised a question, and what they expected to happen if they followed the next step. Compare their answers with your intention. Where did the page make the relationship clear? Where did it leave work for them to do?

Repeat the exercise with a second audience member. One response may reflect personal preference. Repeated confusion is a stronger signal that the page needs attention. You are not looking for praise. You are looking for the distance between what you intended and what a new person can see.

Turn Observations Into Decisions

These exercises may produce more information than you can use at once. Choose the finding that connects three things: it matters to the audience, it matters to the founder or team, and the business can act on it. That is a stronger place to begin than choosing a visual change simply because it is easy to make.

Write the observation without interpretation. For example: “Three recent clients asked whether the first call was free and what would happen afterward.” Then write the possible meaning: “The website does not explain the purpose or cost of the first call clearly.” Then identify what you need to verify: “Ask a few more prospective clients what they think the call includes.” Now you have a decision to make, not a vague feeling that the site needs improvement.

Start with the change you can make yourself. If you now see that a service page is confusing or the next step is missing, you can fix that. You do not need to hire someone to earn the right to make a good decision. If the findings keep contradicting one another, if you cannot tell which audience to prioritize, or if your founder, team, offer, and website are telling different stories, that is a different kind of problem. It may call for an outside perspective and a strategy shaped around your actual business.

A brand becomes more coherent when its next choices respond to real information. That does not mean waiting for perfect data. It means being honest about the difference between what you know, what you think, and what you are choosing.

CHAPTER 8

Your Next Decision

If you have read this far, congratulations. You have looked beyond the logo and asked what your brand is helping people feel, understand, and choose. I would say you have already done something more than 90% of business owners never pause to do. That is real progress, and I’m excited for what you do next.

You do not have to rebuild everything at once. Choose one relationship you want your brand to strengthen, then make one useful change this week. It might be a clearer offer, a better next step on your website, or a more honest conversation with a customer. Small, deliberate action counts.

The old G.I. Joe line got it right: “Knowing is half the battle.” The other half is putting what you know into action. You have more clarity now. Let it help you make a decision, then give that decision a chance to work.

You do not have to figure out every next step alone. Neuroiety has free resources and practical, cost-conscious ways to help you move forward with useful guidance. I’m happy to help you find the support that fits what you actually need.

Be thoughtful about anyone who promises you the world. Sometimes the Temu or Shein version looks great in the listing and turns out to be something very different when it arrives. Ask what you will actually receive, who will do the work, what support is included, and what is outside the offer. You deserve clear answers and work that holds up after the sale.

Explore your tendencies at PsychietyInc.com and the Neuro Human Branding® questions and free resources at NeuroietyInc.com.

CHAPTER 9

The Signal at a Glance

The central idea

A brand is a relationship people experience. It takes shape through what the founder intends, what the audience brings, and what the organization repeatedly says and does. Strong brand choices make the offer clearer, the experience more credible, and the next step easier to choose.

Four ideas to keep close

1 People bring a whole life. Their history, expectations, needs, and limited attention shape every encounter.

2 The founder and audience both belong. Build a brand that reflects the founder's values while helping the audience feel recognized and served.

3 A request is a beginning. Ask what the person hopes will change, then listen to what they say and do.

4 A promise needs proof. Align the words, visuals, offer, website, and actual service so the relationship feels consistent.

Three questions to ask

- [ ] What kind of work and relationship do I want to build?
- [ ] What is the person I serve hoping will change when they choose me?
- [ ] Does my brand make that relationship clear in what it says, shows, and delivers?

Try this next

TRY THIS NEXT
Ask someone unfamiliar with your business what they think you offer, who it is for, and what they would do next. Compare their answers with your intention. The gap gives you a practical place to investigate.

What I learned / the next change I will make